Since I can remember, I think of Alentejo as the most peaceful place in my Country. On the rolling plains of this land, thousands of cork oak trees open their branches to the sky and, in a powerful reunion, conceive an impressive scenario where time seems to stop.

Alentejo mirror has the similar conceptual approach to the typical cork oaks trees we find in the South of Portugal, originally made by the Alentejo side table. Resembling the same angular structure of these trees, the mirror is embraced by two grand tree trunks which branches are opened in obtuse angles. In fact, this creation was once again influenced by a particular tree standing near a lake that naturally reflects a perfect match of itself in the water mirror. The structure is in cast brass with patinated effect and results of a careful sculpted work that highlights the natural details.
